Japan Trade Center of Los Angeles is one of several representative offices established in the United States by the Japan External Trade Organization (JETRO) located in Tokyo, Japan. As a representative office of JETRO, there is neither a formal written contract nor an exchange of correspondence between the parties which can be said to formulate an agreement. Rather, there is a general understanding between Japan Trade Center of Los Angeles and JETRO in regard to the functioning of the Los Angeles office. Generally, the Japan Trade Center of Los Angeles has been established to provide advisory service for the fostering, encouraging and facilitating the exchange of trade between the United States and Japan. Its responsibility is to provide information to interested persons regarding this exchange of trade. Further, it has served to assist members of the organization doing business in the United States by orientating them to U.S. customs and practices.

The expenses of performing the services of the Japan Trade Center are paid entirely by remittances from Japan. Because of this financial support, no fees are charged to any one for services rendered. It is expected that this office will continue to function as long as it proves beneficial in accomplishing its purpose.
